KEY FINDINGS

For the past three years, ESSENCE and the Black Women's Roundtable Intergenerational Public Policy Network have partnered to survey the political attitudes of Black women.

In the first study in 2015, we learned that 64% of Black women viewed voting as an important responsibility given the history of Black people. Black women overwhelmingly (78%) believed the Democratic Party best represented their interest; in comparison, only 1% had trust in the Republican Party. We also learned that affordable health care was the top issue for Black women.

The second study was conducted before the 2016 Presidential election, and the confidence in the Democratic Party increased to 85% with no change in support for the Republican Party. Also, affordable health care continued to be the top issue for Black women.

The 2017 survey conveys that Black women's support for the Democratic Party has declined over the past year, but there was no change in support for the Republican Party; there was a rise in the belief that no political party represents them; and President Trump received a failing grade.

This year, the top two issues for Black women are affordable healthcare and criminal justice reform. Living wage jobs & quality public education tied as the #3 top issues. Affordable healthcare remained the #1 issue for Black women for the third year in a row. For millennial Black women, criminal justice reform continues to be their #1 issue for the second year in a row.

Additionally, this year's survey added questions related to the community involvement of Black women, showing most are actively involved in their communities and faith institutions.

A majority of Black women (61%) are active in their community, even more so for the ESSENCE Festival attendees (70%).

- The ESSENCE Festival appeals to activists of all ages. In the 2016 Festival focus group research, a few participants stated that they come to the festival often to gain useful information to take back to their communities.

- ❖ The belief that the Democratic Party best represents the interest of Black women has dropped significantly in a year, from 85% to 74%. In fact, more Black women think that none of the political parties represent them well, up to 21% from 13% in 2016.
- ❖ Affordable health care is the top concern for one out of two Black women, ranking as the #1 issue for three years in a row.
 - A third of Black women in the current survey are concerned about the rise in hate crimes, a new issue added to the list.
 - In 2017, nearly 1 in 2 Black millennial women identified criminal justice reform as their #1 concern.

Rating the New President

- ❖ President Trump's approval rating with Black women is abysmal. He received an F for his job performance, and 93% disagreed with the statement that "Trump is addressing the issues that are most important to me."

What Black Women Want President and Congress To Address

- ❖ Protecting the Affordable Healthcare Act is the issue a majority of Black women (56%) want the President and Congress to address now, confirming how important this issue is for them. Black women also want them to protect Medicare/Medicaid (18%) and Social Security (14%).

Black women are activists, especially Festival Goers.

- ❖ Community activism is important to Black Women of all ages.
 - ❖ ESSENCE Festival women (70%) lead in activism when compared to ESSENCE Insiders (59%)
